Smoking for King and Country

The beneficial impact of the First World War on the British tobacco industry became an approved symbol of comradeship and patriotism. In an editorial of October 1914, it was claimed that it might almost be said that a cigarette and the very next thing he seems to worry about is ammunition as precious as that of the rifle. While front-line troops were probably more often effective to smoke in the trench, the war ended with the traditional war of trenches.
