Apps of Hate?

Secret Whisper. Ask.fm. Yik Yak. Kik. Their owners are making millions off of you. But are they turning a blind eye to deadly cyberbullying and suicide?

It was a Tuesday afternoon in August when the hateful message about Sophie R. appeared on Secret, the app that allows you to share secrets anonymously for all to see—an accusation that she was cheating on her boyfriend, Jared. The allegation contained one of the most hurtful turn-phrases words you can imagine, boldly standing out in white lettering against a purple background.

It didn’t take long for others to chim in:

“I totally called that.”

“Sophie is the WORST.”

“I heard this tool. Sophie is terrible and always posting. Jared deserves better.”

The hate piled on. An hour after the post went up, someone flagged it as bullying. But the message wasn’t removed as you’d expect, given Secret’s anti-bullying policy. Instead, more comments accumulated—all of them threatening. A day later, the message was still there for all to see.

Most cyberbullying stories like this don’t end well. Even if the rumors are spread on apps like Secret, Whisper, Ask.fm, Yik Yak, and Kik Messenger, those falsely falsely, in which they often are, the person being bullied—and this is the worst-case scenario—ends up in tears, feeling rejected and violated. In the worst cases, the consequences have been tragic. (It’s been reported that Ask.fm has been linked to nine suicides over the past three years.)
