Q&A with U.S. Secretary of Education Betsy DeVos

U.S. Secretary of Education Betsy DeVos has faced big challenges in her more-than-six months in office—setbacks in Congress on her school choice proposals, difficulty staffing her department, protests greeting her at every turn, not to mention the political stockiness of serving a controversial president.

She’s also come into the agency at a consequential time, with every state filing a plan to implement the Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA), the first update to the main federal K-12 law in over a decade. And she may be at the department when Congress next considers an up-date to special education laws.

We talked about that in a wide-ranging interview September 15, the final day of the secretary’s “Rethink School” tour, which covered six states.

I asked Education Secretary Betsy DeVos: "You’re facing all these challenges. What are you most proud of so far?"

BDV: I think I’ve had enough conversations in enough different places with educators to know that there’s a higher than average level of frustration around the inability to really try to do things differently. The bureaucracy and forces of status quo … it’s hard to change. And in too many places there isn’t the kind of autonomy at a building level to really kind of break out of that mold and do things differently to meet...
